Pepin de la Blinias occupied. In one of the most retired streets of the town, but close to the port, a large house, where also were stored the goods in which he and an elder brother dealt. There was an office where the clerks attended to their duties and received their salaries, the apartments above of the men, and an extensive warehouse. This had been just emptied of goods and cleared out for the purpose of receiving the cargo of two ships recently arrived in port.

On the next day Pepin de la Blinias, knocking sometimes at windows, sometimes at doors, and always going through the form of the same conversation. He thus in the space of a little more than half an hour, visited the houses of more than fifty citizens, and then he returned home. In the warehouse he found more than 200 barges collected, while at every instant, others arrived. Pepin having visited but chiefs of ten, whose business it was on such occasions, secretly to advise their fellows, Porcon de la Barbinais was there, and he at once, by common consent, as the oldest man present, took the chair.

He told them that a moment long looked forward to had arrived. The so-called king of France, certainly a brave and gallant man, but a usurper, and heretic, was about to attempt to lay his hand on St. Malo. That city had enjoyed ten centuries of freedom, of liberty and independence, but of late years had fallen under a kind of semi-slavery to the kings of France, who, however, had never been able to impose taxes, leaving, too, to the people the election of their officers.

Now, then, or never, was their time. Let them at once fly to arms, and take possession of the citadel; they would then be free. A loud exclamation of delight and acquiescence burst from the assembly.

But, citizens and people of St. Malo, said Porcon, rising from his chair, though what Pepin proposes be true and just, you must not forget that it is difficult of execution. We can never be independent unless the castle be ours.

Then let us take it, replied Pepin quietly. Young man, 'tis easier said than done. The castle is well defended; it has within its walls troops of tried valor and heroism. How can we, burghers and citizens, hope to attack and capture such a citadel? Stone walls are hard and man's flesh is weak.

We can try, continued Pepin de la Blinias modestly. His very tone was heroic.

We can all die, replied Porcon, shaking his head. No one ever doubted the valor of the Malouines; but courage can do little against stone ramparts.

The citizens looked grave, and Pepin bit his lip. He seemed, young and ardent as he was, to fear that the counsels of peace would prevail.

Let us, at all events, prepare some plan. There is no time to lose; not a day. Not a moment—an instant, said a deep and earnest voice—the voice of one who, as he spoke, stepped up to where Porcon sat, and cast off a thick cloak and slouched hat, which had gained him admittance to the assembly.

Michel the traitor! cried the whole assembly with one voice. We are betrayed!

A rush took place towards the audacious intruder, who, however, stood firm, while Porcon, holding out his hand implored silence.

We are not wild beasts! he thundered; he still, let Michel speak. He is our fellow citizen. Silence!

you a reparation of the most marked kind; command—we obey! Michel simply bowed his acceptance, and then gave hurried orders.

Pepin, pick out fifty-five of the younger members of our body, youths who can climb, and whose heads are not likely to grow dizzy. Let these follow us. Do you, Porcon, arouse the whole guard, and when you hear his horn sound from the summit of the General Tower, attack the Quion-Grogne. The gates will soon open, and the castle is ours. But mark me; take not the life of one man. Once up, I shall haul up the ladder contained in this packet. It will support a dozen at least. Let parties of thirteen and fourteen ascend at a time. But, recollect, I will come down again.

For months he had prepared for the contingency that had occurred. In a hollow of the outward battlements of the tower, beneath some overhanging weeds, he had concealed a long, knotted cord, that measured a hundred and twenty feet. This he had fastened, while the king's attention was withdrawn to a canon, and then bidding Isabella turn her head away, had descended with the agility of a gazelle.

At this moment Pepin was going on the signal-horn, to announce to all to be ready; they had arrived at the port.

The night was dark, gusty and tempestuous; the moon had fallen some two hours, and left a gray, cold sky, which soon was robed in clouds, that came driving up from the north-west with singular rapidity.

Who goes there? said a deep, commanding voice that made Michel shudder. He lay still and made no reply, his hand upon both pistol and dagger, resolved that no man made by God's hand should cause his enterprise to fail.

At this instant of time Michel heard, distinctly above the storm, the first stroke of the half-hour; his heart sank within him. The ladder was not safely fastened on one side, on he went, however, with cold and steady hand, knotting, tying, until he heard the deep-toned bell cease to vibrate.

Where, in God's name, are we going? said he. He was one of the sailors who was to take care of the boats, and seek shelter up the river, as soon as the party had landed.

When Henry IV. awoke the first time from a heavy sleep, his eyes were so fatigued that he did not perceive the unusual movement in the town. He never thought of looking towards the sea; it never struck him that any danger could come hence. He accordingly, although determined to watch through the night, allowed himself to gain upon him, believing that any danger would become apparent dawn. When he heard a faint, inarticulate sound, he was half asleep, and what he heard seemed part of a restless dream.

The king was a peasant, alone in a hut—that is, the only one awake. On a couch slept a beautiful young woman, with two children beside her. All looked warm and comfortable, and a dog rested comfortably at her feet before a bright fire.

Presently, however, but I have been so happy gazing at you that, I never thought of slumber, replied the peasant.

Then will I get up, and share your watching, said she; and the beautiful girl rose, and advanced towards the fireplace, while the dog leaped up, wagging its tail.

The king at this moment started, and found himself seated on a hard stone bench, on the summit of the great tower of the General, a man looking curiously at him. Who is it? cried he, leaping up, and laying his hand upon his sword.

unexampled in history, and which, in days when courage alone obtained much credit, should have immortalized them all. All stood close together, grasping the rock; no one moved a step. They would have rolled into the sea, and none could have stirred to save them. All were silent, waiting the orders of Michel; and the lightning flashed, and the thunder rolled, and then the clock of the cathedral struck one.

You see this cord? said Michel in a low, firm, but clear voice. I must ascend by this! It will safely bear but one man. Once up, I shall haul up the ladder contained in this packet. It will support a dozen at least. Let parties of thirteen and fourteen ascend at a time. But, recollect, I will come down again.

Michel felt his head swim. His daring attempt in favor of the liberties and hereditary independence of his native island was about to fail before an unforeseen accident. No sentinel ever guarded at night the impregnable citadel; they occupied the other ramparts. But in twenty minutes his companions would be climbing up, perhaps, a half-forgotten ladder. Inside the port-hole which was large, lay a heavy cannon, the carriage of which was mending. On this depended the whole success of the young man's enterprise. He encased himself as well as he could outside on the stone projection which served as a gutter, holding on inside the port-hole; then he unfastened the rope, and passed one end round the canon; to this, watching the sleeper the while time, he attached a heavy piece of iron prepared for the purpose, and long secreted, which he then began lowering, by this means slowly drawing up the rope ladder. The quarter struck, and the sleeper slightly moved. Michel went on deliberately, with his work as if the man had not been there, and soon found the end of the rope ladder in his hand.

At this moment the moon moved again, and rose. Michel had laid down his musketoon, but he clutched a dagger and a heavy pistol. He had never taken life, but now he was resolved to spare not this stranger, if he stood in the way of his success.

Who goes there? said a deep, commanding voice that made Michel shudder. He lay still and made no reply, his hand upon both pistol and dagger, resolved that no man made by God's hand should cause his enterprise to fail.

Michel, exclaimed Porcon rising, we owe you a reparation of the most marked kind; command—we obey!

At this moment Michel heard a noise that made his blood run cold; he clearly distinguished the grating of a cord against iron, and knew that the ladder had slightly slipped. His anguish was intolerable.

Young man, exclaimed the king with severity, I am not accustomed to receive such replies. Your answer bodes no good. Already I have spoken to the count of my suspicions, and they are now realized. Speak, young man, or I will have you arrested as a traitor, and punished as you deserve.

How mean you, sirrah? continued Henry IV., much struck by the lofty and bold manner of the young man. Who then, if you please, am I? Henry of Navarre, king of France, but not monarch of St. Malo, which since its foundation has been an independent community, allied sometimes to France, sometimes to Brittany, but never the serf of either.

But France and Navarre are now united; you can pretend no longer to resist both. You might cope with one, backed by the other, but never with united France.

You are mistaken, said Michel modestly. But, madam! said the king, his anger vanishing before the other's audacity, you may be sure that all France will soon be peacefully inclined, and ruled over by me. How, then, can you contend against me, with a citadel commanding your town?

How mean you, sirrah? continued Henry IV., much struck by the lofty and bold manner of the young man. Who then, if you please, am I?

She was one of the most beautiful women of her age, was gentle, modest, accomplished, and conspicuous for her constant regard for duty.

The HAND THAT SAVES US.—Two painters were employed to fresco the walls of a magnificent cathedral; both stood on a rude scaffolding constructed for the purpose, some forty feet from the floor. One of them was so intent upon his work that he became wholly absorbed, and in admiration of the picture, gazing at it with intense delight.

P. S.—Such as have less shame than money may look out for the lawyers! Keep up!

A well-trained business man in Waterville, who has succeeded, from small beginnings, in acquiring a handsome property and an excellent reputation, says he is more indebted for his prosperity to this brief injunction, 'Keep up!' than to all the good advice he ever received.

Young man, why shouldn't you 'keep up'? It is easier than to lag behind. Look at those in the rear; the dust raised by those who lead off is always in their eyes. Besides, if you keep up you have a hand in marking the direction; if you fall behind, you must either be a follower, or make a 'smash' by running off the track.

The Legislature—where is it? Now that the representatives of the people have handed themselves over to the Supreme Court for trial, there is a favorable opportunity for their constituents to see who is in fault. We do not mean that they should look to the opinion of the Supreme Court for the right or wrong of the case.

The wheels of legislation are blocked—everybody can see that. About a thousand dollars a day of the people's money is expended to no purpose—everybody can see that. Who produced this state of things?—anybody can see that.

La Patrie and Bulletin give a report that the Czar has issued orders for immediate preparations for crossing the Danube. If this be true, it seems that the Czar has rejected the propositions of the Four Powers.

The deliberations of the Divan continued three days—the 20th, 21st and 22d. On the 21st, a tumult arose. A mob of 3000 soldiers, urged on by the Ulema, assembled to present a remonstrance to the Sultan, declaring that the Scheriat (constitution) was violated by the resolutions of the Council.

Something definite as to the action of the Czar was daily looked for at London and Paris. It was stated from St. Petersburg, Dec. 20, that Nicholas formally rejected the Vienna protocol and note of the 5th, but would consent to receive and examine the Turkish propositions of the 30th, as above, although he persists in refusing to recognize the right of European intervention in matters which, he says, concern Russia and Turkey alone.

It was reported several times during the week, on the Paris Bourse, that the Czar had received and rejected the Turkish propositions, but the rumor was premature.

The instructions to the fleets are, that in the event of meeting Russian ships of war, they will in the names of their respective governments, request the Russian officer in command to return with his ship or ships to Sebastopol, where he will find further instructions from his own Government. On refusal force will be used.

Russian statements affect not to feel the slightest alarm as regards the threat of an allied squadron. On the contrary, they assert that the entry of the fleets will be a signal for a simultaneous outbreak in India, Algeria, and Greece, and a Greek insurrection throughout the Turkish Empire, all being already organized by the agents of the Czar.

The latest news from Persia is more satisfactory, but seems irreconcilable with the statement that the Russian General Yermoloff commands the Persian army.

A despatch dated Constantinople, 25th, says that the British charge d'affaires in Persia has succeeded in terminating the differences between Great Britain and Persia. Ahmed Effendi, the Turkish charge, is satisfied with the explanation of the Persian government, and did not think it right to interrupt relations with the Shah.

Accounts from all parts of Russia describe extraordinary military activity, unexampled since 1813. The Czar has just got a supply of twenty millions of rubles from the church.

The London Observer says that agents are on the way to the United States to purchase ships and arms privately for Russia.
