

Gardiner Sept 27 - 1895-

Dr Smith, -

I believe I told you that I would write you something when you left Gardiner so here goes: I have read yours (or rather Henry De Long's) "Knutzen Sonata" and I have come to the conclusion that Wampanoag did about right in suppressing the same. There is altogether too much low-necked truth in it to be circulated among the young idea; it would have a tendency to "teach them how to shuck" without taking a fair aim. But then, taken as a picture of humanity as a whole, I cannot help thinking that it is open to considerable criticism. We are not all rakes, and there is such a thing in the world as a good woman, excluding those angular spinsters who preach about woman suffrage and diseased ballots until they rope in honest men's wives and teach them to desert their families and husbands until the poor devils get drunk out of sheer disgust. (God never intended man and woman both to wear pants.) And yet taking the sentiment expressed in the "Sonata" as the natural outburst of the individual telling the story the book is quite an interesting thing; the question is, did Webster intend it to be applied to the whole human race or did he simply see a way to show the conditions to which a man may bring himself by his ungodly actions? In this book the wife would have been a very decent sort of a woman if her husband ~~so~~ had not "married" so pronouncedly in his younger days and so been led to believe that they were all alike.

I understand that Tolstoy has written another book in conjunction with a Russian peasant, elaborating the same ideas. That seems to me unnecessary.

For the last week I have been following Dumfries, the engineer, with an axe and an armful of stakes together with a leveling rod and a corn cut pipe. By this work I was enabled to join the River Survey gang and will go to work to-morrow morning. There will be about a month of it. I must confess that I would rather smoke the pipe under a tree in August and read Virgil, but the trouble is that the Roman gentleman pays such ~~delicious~~ devilish slim wages that before you know it you have no tobacco for your pipe. Dollars are convenient things to have in South, but this diabolical, dirty race that men are running after tem disjuncts me. I shall probably outgrow this idea, but until I do I shall labor quite contented under the delusion that is something to live outside of "business." Business be damned. Write when you get a chance.

Yours - E. Robinson
